Zealand. Some had been pardoned who were more guilty than some who had been detained in prison. The Attorney General recalled the state of public opinion the time of the State trials. It was generally felt that the sentence of death was deserved by a number of prisoners, and that nothing else would suffice to ensure the stability of the Government. However, the Executive had deemed it proper to substitute sentences of practically life imprisonment for the death penalty. Then, on the Fourth of July, a large number of the followers of the insurrection were released from prison. Public opinion among supporters of the Government continued to become ameliorated, until as Thanksgiving Day approached there was a decided sentiment prevalent that even the leaders should be pardoned. It was difficult for him to understand why on that occasion discrimination had been exercised with regard to prisoners who were at least equally guilty.

Minister Damon said that if there was any one thing that had produced harmony in this community it was the exercise of clemency that had been made. The change in feeling toward the Government had been almost more than the case deserved. The world moved swiftly and Hawaii must needs keep pace with it. If there was any promise of strengthening the Government by severity, perhaps it might be said that too much haste had been used in granting pardons. But situations are constantly changing and we must keep up with the rest of the world. It is a graceful thing that this Government should grant amnesty at the close of the year. I believe the people at large will respect the Government for it more than ever. We must always have an opposition, but, in my opinion, there will be more popular confidence in the permanency of the Republic consequent upon a magnanimous policy toward these offenders than has yet been shown.

Minister King said: I opposed pardon on the last occasion, as you all know, but now I am in favor of the pardoning of all the remaining prisoners.

Mr. Wilder: Some of the most guilty have been pardoned. Some who were perhaps more guilty than any of the prisoners were never tried. Whether our action before was right or not there is only a few left in prison. Let us err on the side of mercy. I was in favor of making a clean breast of it last time, and letting them all out. I move that the prayer of the petitioners be granted.

Mr. Murray seconded the motion, yet would have the pardons come as a voluntary action of the State, without regard to the petitions at all.

Mr. Kennedy asked about the conditions.

Minister Smith answered that the pardons would imply suspension of sentences.

Mr. Kennedy suggested that the prisoners should all be released not later than tomorrow, if possible let them out tonight.

President Dole remarked that if the Attorney General had been present on the previous occasion, he would have recognized the difference between the cases of the prisoners released and of those detained. Those pardoned were just as guilty perhaps, but their attitude for some time had been different from that of the others. Although the Executive Council had recommended pardon to more than the Council of State would agree to, yet there was real reason for drawing the line that was drawn at that time. Certain prisoners had drawn up petitions and others had not. I think that distinction is now practically done away with.

Mr. Jones: Does this dispose of all of them?

The President: Yes; every man. The motion being put it carried unanimously.
